

Chris Mills

Chris Mills is a psychotherapist who worked for many years with couples in conflict before starting to practise alongside family lawyers trying to help separating couples achieve the most humane and healthy divorces. As someone for whom supervision was an essential, he could see the immense stresses suffered by lawyers who had no understanding of the relational dynamics they were involved in, and no organised support in managing this key element of their work.

His early experiments in offering supervision to family lawyers were enthusiastically taken up by Family Law In Partnership, a niche firm based in central London. This was the start of his working alliance with the firm's founder Gillian Bishop. The formation of the training organisation FLiP Faculty arose from this, which includes the very successful modular training in Family Law Supervision, believed to be the first of its kind anywhere.

Chris is the author of The Case That Really Got To Me: An Introduction To Family Law Supervision (available through www.chrismills.uk.com). His podcast entitled The Art Of Listening formed part of the first series of Conversations With Annalisa podcasts (on Spotify) that reached number 5 in the UK podcast chart in July 2021.
